An Art Work in Four Parts-Clara Morri and Her Superb Company Miss Clara Morris appeared at the Opera House last night with such support as so her aid: for it is not often that a star, at the cost of dividing honors, will pay his or her audience the respectful courtesy of her andrence the respectful courtesy of presenting a company of artists. With indigment and taste almost exceptional, Miss Morris has composed her company of players who make a worthy constellation for the one particular star to shine in. With Mr. Eben Plympton for leading man, Miss Bijou Heron, and such an "old woman" as Mrs. M. A. Farren, the princi-pal roles were in most cavable hands.

woman" as Mrs. M. A. Farren, the princi-pal roles were in most capable hands. The performance was effective and pleasing not only because Miss Morris has a tender and intelligent appreciation of her role and plays it with charming naturalness, but because the men and woman on the stage seemed to live a real life, to be moved by really human im-pulses, to say and do real things in an en-tirely real-life way. The artistic force of the production lies in the impression upon the audience that there is ever a reserve of power—that not all is spent in any scene in any moment.

or power—that not all is spent in any scene in any moment.

There are few plays equal to this of Wilkie Collins' in the play and counter— play of the emotions. In the beautiful telling of an old, old story—as old as man's baseness and the misery of human kind—in the thread of hope which he has woven into the woof of his fabric, the author has run the whole gamut of the sensibilities. He has dealt with a forbidden subject, but so gently, so delicately and withal so candidly that, interpreted as it was last night, it not only did not shock, but won the sympathy of an audience of intelligent and refined people. Such a dramatic event merits ampler comment than is possible at this time. The play was not over until nearly midnight. Long as the waits were, for some unaccountable reason; though Miss Morris was suftering from a severe cold; though there was not the contagious magnetism of a full house, it is to be said that a more delightful entertainment has not been man's baseness and the misery of human delightful entertainment has not been given anywhere. In the third act Miss Morris' train caught fire from the footlights, and as the house was fast rising to us feet. Miss Morris trod on the flame and with the aid of Stage Carpenter Richardson, put it out, going on with an effective scene as though nothing hadhappned to disturb her equi poise.

accused parties have been acquitted. On a guilty of complicity in the Geyer diamond robbery, Tuesday Ed MacNamara was acquitted of stealing a watch at the Arion hall at a ball, and yesterday Patrick Connelly was cleared of the charges of burglary and grand larceny.

The jury which tried this case was composed of Leroy Elder, Charles Zimmerman, Robert T. Ford, J. W. Baird, Fred Lane, Peter Wendel, Jr., George Amos, Henry Schultz, J. W. Warden, James Demain, Ambrose Stochr and R. S. Agnew. Connelly was indicted jointly with Mike, alias "Bull" McDonough, for the robbery of the grocery of Augustus Gering, on Nineteenth street, on the evening of February 28, 1885. It will be remembered that three men entered the store and attempted to induce the proprietor to leave by telling him something was burning in the cellar. Failing in this, one of them, said to be Mc. Donough, held him while the others stole $35, and all made their escape. Mc-Bonough has not since been apprehended. The third party is unknown. Several eye witnesses of the affair yesterday positively identified Connelly as one of the men, while others, acquaintances of the prisoner, as positively denied that he was there.
